

Health Studies

A degree in Health Studies provides students with the opportunity to work in healthcare, but not necessarily direct patient care. Many students will opt to pursue a Masters Degree in Public Health, Masters of Business Administration, Master's in Public Administration, or even law school to focus their career on global and environmental health, prevention, and to improve systems and administrative practices in healthcare.

Not-for-profit agencies

Peace Corp

Federal & State Government agencies

Hospital systems

Healthy equity programs

Schools/Universities

Health centers

Research organizations

COMMON EMPLOYERS

PROFESSIONAL ORGANIZATIONS

American College of Epidemiology
American Public Health Association
Association for Professionals in Infection Control
Association of State and Territorial Health Officials
Explore Health Education
National Association of Community Health Center
National Association of County and City Health Officials
National Public Health Leadership Development Network
Public Health Foundation
Society for Public Health Education

STRATEGIES ON ENTERING THE FIELD

- For healthcare administration choose a major or minor in business, finance, or accounting
- For policy related careers consider public health
- Gain experience through internships in a healthcare setting
- Learn how to use database and spreadsheet software
- Pursue a master's degree in public health, health administration, public administration, business, or related field